Reps Noujaim, D'Amelio: 2008-09 Budget Flawed, but Avoids Major Tax Hikes

Increases Medicaid Reimbursements, Hikes Education Aid to Cities and Towns

Although the budget approved by the state House of Representatives Saturday morning should have offered more tax relief and gotten a better handle on state spending, it avoids major tax increases, increases Medicaid reimbursements and provides more education aid to municipalities, state Representatives Anthony D'Amelio and Selim Noujaim said today.

“While I am very pleased with many aspects of the budget, I also am disappointed with some of them. I am disappointed that spending is increased by 8.8 percent and that smokers were unfairly singled out for a tax increase by the imposition of higher taxes on cigarettes,” said Representative Noujaim, R-74th District. “However, the city of Waterbury received a lion’s share of state aid and our two hospitals were the beneficiaries of increased funding for Medicaid reimbursements for hospitals, doctors and clinics, which helps Medicaid patients. Additionally both hospitals will benefit from a one-time grant that will be distributed to distressed hospitals – meaning our hospitals will remain financially strong and inner city patients will continue to receive quality care.”

“There’s a lot to like and a lot to dislike about this budget,” said Representative D’Amelio, R-71st District. “If there was a Republican majority in the state legislature, you’d be looking at a budget that controlled spending better than this one does and offered more tax relief to the people of Waterbury, Middlebury and the rest of the state. Because we developed our ‘No Tax Increase,’ alternative budget, which received strong support around the state, the budget that finally passed does not significantly increase the burden on Connecticut taxpayers. Given the fact that the Democrats control both houses of the state legislature, this budget is an improvement over the proposals that were offered earlier in the 2007 session, all of which called for major tax hikes.”
